

Usual care: In research methods, the supply of "usual care" to the control group implies that this group receives standard care normally provided for the condition studied (in this case autism) in the region where the study takes place. This particular methodological strategy is used because it would be unethical to deprive the control group of care simply to facilitate comparison with the group receiving the study treatment.