

DNA methylation: DNA methylation is a type of chemical modification of DNA that is stable over rounds of cell division but does not change the underlying DNA sequence of the organism. The effect of this process is to alter expression of a given genes product, usually a protein, allowing cells to stably maintain different characteristics despite containing the same genomic material.